This land-slide of 1830 and 1848 were repeated on Mount Mansfield, on the Cambridge side, on Friday, June 3d. This slide was about two miles long, from one to six hundred feet wide, and from twenty to forty feet deep. An eye witness says that trees from fifty to eighty feet in length and from one to three feet in diameter were hurled down the mountain-side like corn-cobs. Rocks weighing from one to five hundred tons were hurled like base-balls, and all this accumulation of timber, rocks and debris is piled up at the base of the mountain, presenting a strange appearance. Trees three feet in diameter were broken into pieces six and eight feet in length, with the bark all stripped, while others, eighty feet in length, were shot into the woods on the side of the slide thirty feet above where the water now runs. The slide passed within a few rods of John Flynn's house at the base, dividing and passing by his side, so as to shut off escape entirely. The damming up of some timber by the merest accident thus saved a family of eight from sudden and sure death. The fall of "Berton" rock at the North, a few rods weighing one hundred tons, occurred in 1808. "Prison" rock, which fell at a later date, is one of the objects of interest which is shown to the Mansfield mountain tourist.
